One hidden resistance is the assumption that there must be something wrong with a child who is not learning. Why are we reluctant to consider the possibility that the child is not to blame? I suspect it is human nature to become a bit defensive when we believe our work or our personhood is being attacked.

Obvious safety issues are clear-cut and usually well addressed in our schools. However, there are less obvious, hidden dangers in our schools that impact the social, cognitive, and emotional well-being of our students. These hidden dangers are not always directly observable, and therefore they are difficult to identify.
